Dear Hubby: —

This seems quite like old times again, don't it? Did you receive the letter I wrote yesterday?

I sure do miss you, precious. I can't realize that you won't be home when I get home in the Evening. I will soon become a little more used to the separation, though, I guess, so don't worry about it. Just now, it is a little hard.

Rose and I went down to the photographer's for the pictures. He didn't make a proof, but simply went ahead and developed them — and therefore they weren't ready. I will take a run up to-day for them. He said they were alright, but of course thats what they all say.

It is just 1.45. And I am wondering what you are doing, what sort of a room you got, and how you found things there in general. Write me everything, honey. I would give anything to be able to see you now. Take care of yourself, precious.

You certainly picked out the best time to go South. The weather became very cold last night and to-day it is something terrible—cold and fierce windy. How is it down there?

Rose is sleeping with me, dear. We were both very tired, so that we went to bed directly after we returned from the photographers.

To-night, Friday night, I shall miss you something terrible. I shall naturally picture how you are spending the night.

If you want any papers or magazines from New York, let me know. Or if there is anything you want, dear, don't neglect to write me about it.

I shall close with love from all, and with love, kisses and best wishes to the dearest husband in the world

From
Your Everloving
Wife.
